In conclusion I beg most respectfully and particularly to call the attention of the Ladies of Hongkong to the above named restorative for the hair, which only requires a trial to prove its efficacy.

NOTICE.

THE Undersigned call the attention of Masters and Agents of vessels discharging at this port to the great advantage to be gained in point of convenience, despatch, and economy, by making use of their Wharves at New Harbour.

With the assistance of steam cranes, a general cargo can be landed easily in a few days—or in about one-fifth of the time usually occupied discharging in the roads.

There are large, dry, and very commodious brick godowns on the wharves, which vessels have free use of for cargo while discharging.

The trouble and disputes with, and pilfering of cargo common among boatmen, are avoided by vessels using the wharves.

Cartage of cargo to the town (which is within easy distance) is guaranteed to be not more than lighterage from the roads, and the cooly hire discharging alongside is less.

There is always a large stock of the best English and Welsh coals on the premises, which are supplied to steamers at the lowest market price, and vessels going alongside to take in or discharge coals pay no wharfage.

Vessels discharging cargo pay a wharfage of 20 cents per ton,—a trifling charge when the immense advantages gained are taken into consideration.

Arrangements have been made by which all repairs to ships or steamers can be done with despatch while the vessels are lying alongside the wharves.

There is an efficient European pilot on the premises, and, when required, a steam-tug is always available.

HONGKONG, JUNE 18TH, 1868.

A QUIET notification in the Government Gazette foreshadows a project, the execution of which would be of no small importance to Hongkong. Considering the trade and enterprise of the place, it is not a little surprising that it should have been contented so long to go without better facilities for unloading vessels than those which exist here. That the cargo-boats are numerous and well handled is certainly true, and the magnitude of the coolie population renders the waste of labour incurred in discharging ships by means of lighters less serious an item in the cost of the process, than it might be elsewhere. Still it remains a process which is either slow or expensive. As a general rule, shipowners and consignees seem to prefer to choose the slow alternative. If a clipper is late for the tea season, of course an extra effort is made, and she is cleared out in a surprisingly short space of time; but a large ship, with a general cargo from London, for instance, not in any particular hurry to go elsewhere, takes her time, as a rule, in a manner which people who have goods on board, "down in the sunless retreats of the —— hold, often find very aggravating. If the voyage from England were shorter, the delay in discharging ships with lighters, would be less readily borne; but it seems a drop in the ocean of time consumed in a voyage round the world, which shipowners do not realise sufficiently to economise. The shorter the voyage the more necessary does it become that the facilities for loading and unloading should be good. What would the Canton steamers be without their wharves?

It now seems that the want of wharves for the general commerce of the port, which has often been discussed, is beginning to suggest definite action in the matter, and a project for the construction of a pier or wharf on a large scale has been submitted to the Government by private firms, who are thinking of undertaking the work, if permission should be obtained. The project, if it has been a long while coming, has come out at last on a rather large scale. It is proposed to construct a T-shaped wharf, which shall run out five hundred feet into the harbour, making it possible not only for a ship to lie alongside the head, but for two others to be simultaneously along both sides of the pier. There can hardly be two opinions about the utility of such a wharf if it were built, but there may easily be considerable doubt concerning the extent of the incidental inconveniences to which it might give rise. If it were five hundred feet long the pier would extend out into forty feet of water—out, that is to say, into a part of the harbour through which steamers are at present continually passing. We do not say that this would be any great evil, as the steamers could pass further out. In fact, there can hardly be any public inconvenience attached to the construction of such a wharf as that proposed, but private interests have to be considered as well as those of the public, and no one can be allowed to inconvenience his neighbours for his own exclusive advantage, even when his own advantage makes him desirous of undertaking a work which the public at large would gladly see carried out. If the owners of property in the neighbourhood of the proposed wharf think their interests are likely to be compromised, it is now their time to speak, and if they can show that the projected work would really inconvenience them, it will be for the projectors to consider if it is worth while to try and overcome their objections.

If it should come to pass that the proposed wharf should be constructed, it is obvious that many more ships will discharge their cargoes there than those belonging or consigned to the owners of property in the immediate neighbourhood. A change, therefore, would come over the mode in which goods are distributed through the various godowns of the town. At present the cargo-boat takes them to that part of the Praya nearest their destination, but the pier will shoot them all on shore at one spot. It will become desirable, therefore, to improve the means of transporting goods east and west along the Praya, and this might easily be done by laying down a tramway, like those used for the American street railways, which were laid down a year or two ago in some London streets, and, rather foolishly, by the way, torn up again afterwards. Such tramways merely consist of flat strips of iron with a very low flange, and trucks with ordinary wheels, if of the proper gauge, can run on them. Moreover, any vehicle making use of them can easily be guided off them and on again, so that they would be peculiarly well adapted to the work they would have to do on the Hongkong Praya. If the Praya were not interrupted, so inconveniently for the commercial development of the town, by the impassable district belonging to the Military Authorities, it would be possible to have a tramway extending from East Point to the Gas works, along which goods could travel with the utmost possible facility. Thus a discharging wharf would be a great public work, which ought to be undertaken at the common cost for the good of all. It might instead of having a T head, have a great circular head, around the circumference of which half a dozen vessels could lie at once. Unless the water-side communications of the town were greatly improved, in a manner which is hardly possible while the naval yard remains where it is, such a public wharf as that would not be nearly so useful as it might be. Moreover, while the finances of the colony are burdened as they are, and hampered by the absurd restrictions which weigh upon them, it is useless to talk about public works, and we must be content to see the development of the place "creeping on from point to point" by the help of private enterprise.

The house in College gardens occupied by Messrs. Birley & Co's Junior Mess, was burglariously entered during last night, but the timely barking of the dog and the clicking of a pistol had the effect of making the intruders vanish. The premises were evidently entered from the back, as also the exit, as some letters and papers belonging to the inmates were found in that direction. Nothing, however, of importance was taken.

Piracy on a European Vessel.

For the first time since the Labra was attacked, more than twelve months ago, a European vessel has been made the victim of China pirates. It is reported that the Lemonix(?) bound from here to Saigon, was attacked while becalmed near Hainan, about the 24th ultimo, by a pirate junk, captured and eventually scuttled. Some of the Europeans on board were killed, some escaped by swimming, and were picked up after being three days in the water. The particulars have been received via Macao, whither the persons who were saved eventually found their way. We have only received vague accounts of the disaster as yet, however, as none of the crew or officers are at present in the colony.

Police Intelligence, 17th June.

BEFORE E. W. GOODLAKE, Esq.

NOISES IN THE COURT.

The number of times during a morning that the sitting magistrate has to call out for silence or quiet, is a sign of the irregular manner in which the approaches of the court are kept by the ushers. Bodies of women, witnesses, complainants, and loafers generally, are allowed to congregate outside the doors of the court, and there hold loud discussions upon the chances of the various prisoners, and other matters. This is doubly annoying to the magistrate, whose efforts to come at the truth of a difficult case are often frustrated by the witnesses, purposely kept apart, being corrupted by the people hanging around the doors, who, were the duties of the ushers properly carried on, would be made to stand in the proper place for the general public.

"STUCK" AND "STRUCK."

Sergeant O'Brien, of the Water Police, J. Foley, of the Army and Navy Tavern, and J. Smith, an ex-innkeeper, were summoned by J. F. Borgess, of the Liverpool Arms, for an assault.

Mr. Hazzland appeared on behalf of the complainant.

The complainant appeared with both eyes in mourning, and his nose damaged, while Sergeant O'Brien had an ugly rap on the head.

Mr. Borgess said that about half-past three o'clock on Monday, the defendants and himself, were playing Euchre in the Army and Navy Tavern. He was playing partners with Smith, and Sergeant O'Brien and the remaining prisoner were partners. The first game (they were playing for drinks) he got "stuck" for, and then the sergeant got "stuck" for one; after which they played "double or quits." This was all done over again, the end being that the sergeant got "stuck" for a considerable number of drinks. He then was asked to "play off," and after a bit, he did. However, he saw the sergeant do a little bit of cheating, so he threw down the cards and said he would not play any more. The sergeant and himself then had a few words, which were ended by the sergeant "hauling off" and hitting him on the nose, and Foley also struck him. After a bit Smith asked him to go out in the yard and wash his face, and he did so, but whilst there the two defendants, Smith and Foley, held his arms, while O'Brien hit him three times in the face. Shortly after the other two defendants struck him, and then Foley called out that he "had had enough." He reported the case to the Inspector on duty.

William Alison, a seaman, said he was at the Army and Navy Tavern on Monday, about half past three o'clock. He saw the three defendants and Borgess playing Euchre for drinks. He heard them wrangling, and then saw Sergeant O'Brien hit Borgess twice in the face. He also saw Burgess hit O'Brien on the head. The defendants were not drunk, although they might have had a glass. He did not see either Smith or Foley strike the complainant.

Robert Burns also saw the parties in the case play Euchre for drinks at the Army and Navy. He heard them quarrel, and then jump up from the bench and catch hold of each other. Foley ran between the parties, and tried to separate them. Sergeant O'Brien struck the first blow, on the nose, and Borgess returned it on the head. He did not see Smith hit the complainant.

Mr. Goodlake said he was inclined to believe that there had been an assault, and he was also of opinion that the two last defendants had not committed any assault. There was no evidence of the assault in the yard, so he would fine Sergeant O'Brien $10, or seven days' imprisonment. Had there not been provocation, it would have been much more. The other defendants would be discharged.

PIRACY ON THE HIGH SEAS.

The seven prisoners charged with this crime, were again brought up before Mr. May, to-day, at half-past ten o'clock.

Mr. Francis (from Mr. Gaskell's office), appeared for the prisoners.

Inspector Daly said he received information of the piracy on the 26th May, and in consequence the gunboat Algerine was sent out to search. At the same time he took measures himself by placing a police-boat at the entrance of the harbour. He boarded the junk No. 156 on the 15th instant, and found first, second and third prisoners on board, as well as the boy who had turned Queen's evidence. The first prisoner gave him his license, and on seeing that the crew of junk No. 156 was given as eight men, he called on the security to produce the rest of the crew, when the fourth, fifth, sixth and seven prisoners were given up. When he went on board the junk there were two muskets, about three-quarters of a pound of gunpowder, and some bullets, also a long telescope. The inspector then described how he had disguised the prisoners as lukongs, and shifted them to different places, and how the witnesses first examined, identified the first three prisoners.

Mr. Francis cross-examined the inspector at some length, but without anything of importance being elicited.

The Chinese interpreter to the Harbourmaster was examined as to the time the junk No. 156 was entered, and, after an immense deal of badgering, said that the master of junk 156 came to him on the 25th of May, and stated that he had arrived the day before, namely, the very day on which the piracy was committed.

Mr. Macbardo(?) said that, according to his books, the junk arrived on the 25th ult., and left again on the 27th.

Mr. Francis addressed his Worship for the prisoners, saying that it was absurd to think that a junk intending to commit a piracy would be frightened away by a few bits of crockery-ware being thrown. Besides which there was nothing whatever against the prisoners in the evidence.

Mr. May in a few words said he would discharge the four last prisoners (the pilots), but the first three who had been identified by the three witnesses, he would commit for trial, bail being allowed, first prisoner two securities $250 each, and the other two, half that amount.

A REAL UNION WITH IRELAND. The following petition has been presented to Parliament, signed by Mr. J. O'Neale Neale, of Brookhill, Devon, and of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Recorder of Walsall:—"That in the summer of the year 1844 your petitioner was retained as counsel to the Portrush, Coleraine, and Armagh Railway, and deputed to visit the North of Ireland on behalf of that railway company; that in the course of his investigations your petitioner was struck by the feasibility of making a solid causeway from the Mull of Cantyre in Scotland to Tor Point, near Cape Fair, in Ireland, a distance of only eleven miles; that no unusual difficulties existed to prevent a set of one or more railways traversing across such causeway, the traffic over which would pay a fair percentage on the cost thereof, but the railway panic of 1845 rendered it impossible to proceed further in the matter; that your petitioner is convinced such a causeway with railways as uniting the three kingdoms would restore that fresh life and prosperity to Ireland, which would greatly tend to heal all religious feuds and extinguish Fenianism, while to England it would impart additional strength, security, and honour. Your petitioner, therefore entreats your honourable House to appoint a Select Committee of Inquiry to ascertain the practicability of making such causeway, and to report thereon to your honourable House."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Ministerial Explanation.

Full reports of the explanation which was given by Mr. Disraeli on the 4th of May in the House of Commons, are contained in the papers by the present mail. The account of what passed between Her Majesty and the Prime Minister, is as clear as words can make it. The whole speech is too long for these columns, but intelligible extracts may be made. Mr. Disraeli said:—

Sir, I am most anxious on this occasion to use no expression which can for a moment be considered in the slightest degree coloured; and I would speak, if I could, on an occasion so critical as the present, with the judicial accuracy of the Bench. But I think I may say, speaking in the hearing, I hope, of fair, but I know of vigilant critics, that during the period we have so held office the conduct of our administration in no important branch was ever impugned. (Cheers.) I think I may even go further. Not only was the conduct of no important branch of our administration ever impugned during that period, but our administration in every branch was supported by this House, and commended even by our opponents. (Hear.) I will take notably the administration of Ireland, that being the country the proposed legislation respecting which has brought about the present political crisis. It is on record that the leader of the Opposition, Lord Russell, has on more than one occasion and in the most marked manner, expressed his entire approbation of the administration of Ireland under Lord Abercorn. He has congratulated Lord Derby on possessing such a colleague, and he has publicly in Ireland announced that under the Vice-royalty of Lord Abercorn the Irish enjoyed the impartial administration of justice (Cheers.) It will be remembered that the administration of Ireland has been conducted under the most difficult and trying circumstances; and, speaking in the presence of many Irish members, of great ability, of long acquaintance with Parliamentary matters, and of extreme vigilance as to the conduct of Ministers, I appeal to their recollection whether, during the whole period of our administration the conduct of the Government in Ireland has not always been spoken of with respect and sympathy by hon. members opposite. (Hear, hear.)

After referring then to the administration of foreign affairs, and our relations with America, he went on:—

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this state of affairs a new question arose in the House of Commons. It arose suddenly at a few days' notice. (Cheers.) I am not imputing that as any blame to the right hon. gentleman. I am only stating facts. I do not wish to have any controversy on a statement of this kind, but I am recalling the recollection of the House to facts. At a few days' notice the House was asked to consider a proposition of a startling character, which was, in fact, no less than the disestablishment of the Church in a portion of Her Majesty's dominions. It so happened, as the House is aware, that on the motion of the leader of the Opposition, Lord Russell, there had been a commission issued by the present Government to inquire into the condition of that Church. It was also well known that the Commission had been intrusted to very able men, and that they were pursuing their labours with considerable energy and determination. It was even known that there was more than a prospect of their reporting the result of those labours to Parliament this year. Therefore, considering the peculiar duties which devolved upon the Government—namely, of passing the supplementary Reform Bills, I don't think it was unreasonable in them that they should have met the proposition of the right hon. gentleman by referring to the Royal Commission, by impressing upon the House the expediency of waiting until the Commission had reported, and then, either in this, or probably in the next Parliament, taking that course which the wisdom of Parliament would authorize and induce it to adopt. The House was not of that opinion; and, therefore, the question was brought before it, the distinct issue whether the Church should be dis-established in Ireland. Now, Her Majesty's Ministers were entirely opposed to that policy, and for distinct reasons which I will give. I go into this matter, not with a wish to obtrude any arguments on the House at this moment, or to introduce any matter of controversy, but merely with the wish that the House should on such an occasion clearly, though succinctly, understand what were the reasons for which we opposed the distinct policy of the right hon. gentleman the member for South Lancashire. We opposed the dis-establishment of the Church in Ireland, first, because we deemed it to be a retrograde policy, that it was calculated to revive and continue animosity, and that it ran counter to that policy of conciliation of classes and creeds which had for 34 years been pursued in this country, and not unsuccessfully. Secondly, we opposed it because we thought it endangered property. Thirdly, we opposed the policy of dis-establishment because it disunited the principle of religion from authority, and by so doing, in our opinion, degraded and weakened authority. And fourthly, lastly, and chiefly, we opposed it because, if that principle were adopted, we could see nothing that would prevent its application to England (cheers) sooner or later, and, in our opinion, much sooner than was anticipated. (Renewed cheers.) The consequences of the application of that principle to England would be very serious. If the union between Church and State is abolished, the Church must either become an imperium in imperio, and so become probably more powerful than the State, and weaken the action of Government, or it must break into endless sects and schisms, which would finally be absorbed by the traditions and discipline of the Church of Rome. (Much laughter and some cheers.) Equally, in either alternative, the Royal supremacy must be destroyed. The Royal supremacy has hitherto been looked upon as the corner-stone of the Constitution. It is universally admitted to be the only security for religious liberty, and, in our opinion, it is one of the main guarantees for our civil rights. (Hear, hear.) These were the reasons why the Government opposed the proposition of the right hon. gentleman. The House, however, by a decided majority, decided in favour of the policy of the right hon. gentleman, and we had then to consider whether the vote of the House in that respect militated against the Constitutional claim to which I have before referred, to advise Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament, and which, in our opinion, was not weakened by our general conduct in the administration of affairs. There were three reasons which proved to their satisfaction that the decision of the House did not militate against the assertion of such a privilege on their part; and they were these:—In the first place, it was evident that no conclusive legislation upon the Church in Ireland could take place in this Parliament. (Hear, hear.) That is acknowledged. In the second place, it was notorious that this question had never been hinted at on the hustings when this Parliament was elected. (Hear, hear). And thirdly—and I state this with the utmost respect to hon. gentlemen opposite, and an unwillingness to assert an opinion which is not the opinion of the majority, but which it is my duty to my colleagues to express—because it is our profound conviction that the opinion of the nation does not agree on this subject with the vote of the House of Commons. (Loud cheers.)

The explanation of the steps which he took in consequence of the defeat in the House, is as follows:—

I will now, with the permission of the House, revert to the vote of Thursday night, and state to the House the course which Her Majesty's Ministers, under these circumstances, felt it their duty to take. After that vote I lost no time in soliciting Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to grant me an audience, and, with that promptitude which Her Majesty always displays when the public interest is at stake, she was graciously pleased to grant that audience immediately, so that I had the advantage of being in audience of Her Majesty on the afternoon of the very day on which the vote was taken. On that occasion I placed—I am sure fairly and completely—before Her Majesty the position of the Government and the position of parties, and the position of the country with respect to them, and I told Her Majesty, with her permission, that under the circumstances—with which from my previous narrative the House is perfectly acquainted—the advice which Her Majesty's Ministers would, in the full spirit of the Constitution, offer to Her Majesty, would be that Her Majesty should dissolve this Parliament and take the opinion of the country as to the conduct of Her Ministers and the question of the Irish Church. But, at the same time, with the full concurrence of my colleagues, I represented to Her Majesty that there were important occasions on which it was wise that the Sovereign should not be embarrassed by personal claims, however constitutional, valid, or meritorious; and that if Her Majesty were of opinion that the question at issue could be more satisfactorily settled, or if the just interests of the country could be more studied by the immediate retirement of the present Government from office, we were prepared to quit Her Majesty's service immediately, with no other feeling but that which every Minister who has served the Queen must possess,—namely of gratitude to Her Majesty for the warm constitutional support which she always gives to her Ministers, and, I may add—as it is a truth which cannot be concealed—for the aid and assistance which every Minister receives from a Sovereign who now has such a vast acquaintance with public affairs (Cheers.) In fact, Sir, I tendered my resignation to the Queen. Her Majesty commanded me to attend Her Majesty in audience on the next day, when Her Majesty was pleased to express her pleasure not to accept the resignation of her Ministry (cheers), and her readiness to dissolve this Parliament so soon as the state of public business would permit. Under these circumstances, I advised Her Majesty that, although the present constituency was no doubt morally competent to decide upon the question of the disestablishment of the Church as the representatives of the constituency in this House, still it was the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers that every effort should be made with a view that the appeal, if possible, should be directed to the new constituency which the wisdom of Parliament created last year; and I expressed to Her Majesty that, if we had the cordial co-operation of Parliament, I was advised by those who are experienced and skilful in these matters that it would be possible to make arrangements by which the dissolution would occur in the autumn of this year.

The Attack on the Duke of Edinburgh.

The cowardly attempt on the life of Prince Alfred has naturally caused the greatest excitement at home. The news which came in the shape of a telegram to the Colonial Office, was forthwith conveyed to the Queen, who is said to have received it with much firmness. Addresses expressing sympathy with her affliction, and congratulations at the Prince's providential escape, were immediately voted by both Houses of Parliament, and nearly every corporation and public body in the kingdom speedily followed suit. In the Daily Telegraph of April 28th, we read:—

As a matter of course, the first words spoken last evening in both Houses of Parliament related to the atrocious attempt upon the life of the Duke of Edinburgh. In the Lords the Earl of Malmesbury expressed the indignation and horror felt by everybody against the miscreant who has been condemned for this outrage. Lord Malmesbury was quite logical and eloquent under the stimulus of such a topic, and justly pointed out that the crime was, it possible, made worse by its utter want of purpose. "It could have changed no dynasty, removed no obnoxious claims and altered no law;" and, if not, therefore, a deed of sheer madness, it must have been prompted by a vile and bitter hatred of the Prince, simply because he was a Prince, and because, to the dull faculties of the assassin, he represented a Government which was baleful to Fenianism. Lord Malmesbury had no idea that the young victim had given any personal provocation to his assailant, and indeed the thought is out of the question. The scene of the attempt was a party of pleasure and charity combined—a picnic, where all was good temper and gaiety. In fact, we have already learned from the colony that, although the trial was postponed at the culprit's request, he has already been condemned on the capital charge of "shooting with intent to kill," and was to be hanged. The noble Earl was able to inform the Peers of that which all would readily expect—namely, that her Majesty received the shocking intelligence with the courage and calmness which become her character and race. He concluded by moving an address expressing the sorrow and indignation of the Upper Chamber at the act, its sympathy with her Majesty, its congratulations upon the escape of the Prince, and its hopes for his speedy recovery. The same earnest expression of loyalty and sympathy was formally made in the Commons by Mr. Disraeli.

The Treason-Felony Trials.

The 28th April was appointed for the trial of the prisoners Richard Burke, alias George Berry, alias Edmund C. Winslow, alias Wallace, thirty-five, of no occupation; Joseph Theobald Casey, twenty-three, clerk, and Henry Mullady, alias Shaw, twenty-six, carpenter "for feloniously and treacherously conspiring together, with divers other persons, to deprive our Sovereign Lady the Queen of the style and Royal name of the Imperial Crown of Great Britain and Ireland." The greatest curiosity was manifested by the public to hear the proceedings. The presiding judges, Mr. Baron Bramwell and Mr. Justice Keating, took their seats on the bench at ten o'clock, and the prisoners were then placed at the bar and called upon to plead. Burke and Shaw pleaded not guilty, and Casey also pleaded not guilty, adding, "I am a loyal man." The counsel for the Crown were the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Giffard, Q.C., Mr. Poland, and Mr. Archibald. The counsel for the prisoners were Mr. Ernest Jones and Mr. MacDonnell for Burke, Mr. Pater for Mullady, and Mr. F. H. Lewis for Casey.

As in the previous case, most of the evidence had already been made public. There was no sufficient proof against Casey, and he was discharged. The trial of the remaining two was concluded on the following day, when the jury, after an absence of a quarter of an hour only, returned a verdict of guilty against both prisoners. Burke made a speech objecting to the way in which he had been tried, in not being treated as an alien, and in not being arraigned before the prisoners in the Clerkenwell case were disposed of. He admitted that he had no complaint to make of the verdict. He did not see, in fact, how twelve reasonable men, upon the case presented to them, could have come to any other. Mr. Baron Bramwell cut him short with a peremptory "Silence!" "I have made up my mind," said his lordship, "that it is a most inconvenient and mischievous thing that a man who has been condemned by the lawful proceedings of the tribunal of the country, which has gained what one may call the victory in the contest, should afterwards assail that tribunal, making a speech, and having apparently all the honours of the contest remaining with him. I have inquired what would be the ordinary punishment passed for such an offence as this in Ireland, where such cases have been more frequently tried, and I have determined, with the concurrence of my learned brother, that the right punishment to inflict upon you, Barry or Burke, is that which I now sentence you to—fifteen years' penal servitude; and on you, Shaw, as a mere tool or instrument, seven years' penal servitude."

A man named Morgan or Mohan, was subsequently charged at the Central Criminal Court with treason-felony, the precise crime laid in the indictment being inciting certain soldiers to desert, with the intent to dethrone the Queen. The prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

The firmness of Mr. Baron Bramwell in stopping the inflammatory harangue which Burke and Shaw had evidently prepared receives praise. The only portion of these Fenian trials which is reproduced in America, and in many parts of Ireland, is the acrimonious bravado which the prisoners discharge at the judge, jury, and counsel as they leave the dock. The Lord Chief Justice allowed Barrett to declaim his treason, and apparently, as Mr. Baron Bramwell said, to carry away "all the honours of the contest." When prisoners are asked what they have to say why sentence should not be passed upon them, the intention of the Court is that they should make a legal objection if they have any ground to object, or, at the furthest, that they should have an opportunity of extenuating their offence. It was never intended that they should harangue in glorification of their crime, and launch forth invectives against those who have brought them to justice. The Court is not bound to listen to such an indecent display, and does no more than its duty in commanding silence.

WHY GO TO A UNIVERSITY?—"What is the use of you gentlemen going to college?" said a farmer in conversation with one of the assistant-commissioners engaged in the recent Schools Inquiry, "My son Walter can write a better hand than you." And the commissioner confesses the fact to be so.

ALWAYS IN EXTREMES.—The correspondent of the Post at Rome writes:—"A striking instance of a purely religious vocation in its most austere monastic form is afforded by the withdrawing from the brilliant existence of a fashionable London life adopted by the Hon. G. Lane Fox, who now wears the garb and adheres to the strictly penitentiary rules of a Dominican novice in the monastery of Santa Sabina, voluntarily inflicting upon himself severer penance even than the rules of the order require of him. I understand that this conscientious convert's ultimate intentions are to embrace the strictest rules of monastic life, as presented by the Carthusian or Trappist orders."

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

From every quarter of the reading globe there comes the same querulous accusation, that nothing so much resembles the last new novel as the last but one, and that the public, utterly weary, but still laborious with paper-cutter in hand, is quite prepared to find the next forthcoming three volumes again an ill-disguised réchauffé of their predecessors. A very distinguished author of romance frankly told his readers only the other day, at the very outset of a novel, that he really had nothing fresh for them; but that, as they were good enough to extend their favour to him, he would do his utmost to please them by dishing up once more the familiar materials. Has it really come to this? Is novel-writing reduced to mere skill in cooking, and dressing, and garnishing, and will neither the covert nor the open yield any new species of game? Is ingenuity worn out, or has everybody got his own little bit of it, and nobody any more? Mr. Mill, following in the wake of Baron Bunsen, assured us some years ago that we were all getting uncommonly—or, perhaps we ought to say, commonly—alike; and if poor human nature is to succumb to such a fate, why should the reflections in the mirror held up to it fare any better?

But is it true? Do we ever by any chance get a really bright, fresh original novel, owing nothing or next to nothing, to any assignable predecessor? Let Dr. Russell step forward with "The Adventures of Dr. Brady" in his hand, and stoutly deny the allegation. In it the author of so many brilliant letters from all parts of the world proves himself, still to be what we have all long known him, and now considerably more. He introduces us to new people, the creatures of his experience, and to a new—quite new—story, out of the same well-stored emporium. There is, he says, no regularity, no order, in his rambling, stumbling history, which rarely goes off at score, but which halts and kicks, and even insists on backing, in a most wilful, unbroken, and provoking manner. This is his own account of it, or rather that of Terence Brady, the regimental doctor, who is allowed to be his own biographer. But the reader will accept the description only if it be understood to be the narrator's own modest account of it. "Provoking" it unquestionably is, because it excites interest which it defies the reader to satisfy unless he consents to read straight on without skipping, and in absolute submission to the storyteller. That it "backs" is likewise true; and did we think it right to extract the main story bodily from the book, disentangle it from all its entertaining surroundings, and present it nakedly and in brief compass, we confess that we should experience some little difficulty. Is it not fairer—it certainly will be easier—to say just so much as to leave the reader wishful that we had said more, and so send him to gratify that additional curiosity at the fountain head? From the moment that little "Terry" returns to Bradystown House, the residence of his dear old grandfather, accompanied by Mohun, the Hindostanee—who undergoes "a regular lambasthin" by Biddy Hennessy, the dairymaid, in consequence of his offering to kiss her; which, together with a partiality for whisky, all the people declared was the only trait in which he resembled a Christian at all—to the very last, when he in vain gallops forward to save the life of the Ranee of Auripore, we remain profoundly engrossed in his passionate desire to know the real fate of his mother, and to behold with his eyes the lovely creature whose portrait alone he possesses. What a career is that of "Beery Billing's" daughter! Stranger was never put down on paper, and it is the career which Terence Brady has to unravel. Mohun could have told him all, and would not. His grandfather tells him as much as he knows, and yet how little it proves to be compared with the whole truth! The old sea-captain puts him more directly on the scent; and when that prince of scoundrels, Allan Fraser, open his eyes still further—even whilst mingling deliberate falsehood with his revelations—Brady is worked up to such a pitch of excitement concerning the parent whom he had once been led to think of as drowned off Ceylon, that he is bent upon a journey to the East in search of her. At that moment, however, his regiment is ordered to the Crimea, the Russian war having just broken out. But he is not taken there in vain. The revelations of Macarthy, the private, are more astounding still; and, though every step further is step deeper in the mire, and every additional word he hears blasts his mother's character more and more damningly, his ardour to gaze upon the lovely face of the picture never deserts him. The Indian Mutiny comes in the very nick of time to take him whither he is burning to be sent, and he goes all the more willingly because the journey will keep him near Mary Butler, the playmate of his early years in Ireland, whom he inwardly adores, and who he now knows, from Rose Prendergast's indiscretion, loves him in return. The scenes in India itself we will not attempt to curtail. They only bring out the extraordinary adventures of his mother into bolder relief, the confirmation of which he hears from her own lips. She had blighted his father's life, cruelly abandoned him—then a mere child—plotted persecution, murder, almost every crime in the calendar; yet, with the witchery of her beauty about her, and adorned with the jewels of the Ranee of Auripore, she stands up before him and justifies her amazing career. Of course, our credulity is largely tasked, as we read of her journey to Ireland, of the plots against the residents of the dominions she gives to Macarthy; and we are almost inclined to ask, with Doctor Brady, on the occasion of some fresh revelations, whether we are "in the flesh and the nineteenth century." Nevertheless, given India and a woman of dazzling loveliness and no antecedents, but young, passionate, ambitious, and without scruple, and what may she not accomplish? Why should she not be impostor, dupe, beggar, and Ranee? The only difficulty is to think of her as really mother, not only of Terence Brady, but also of Mabel Fraser. The difficulty, however, is one of our own creating, and a little stretch of imagination rids us of it.

But it would be the greatest mistake in the world to suppose that the "Adventures of Doctor Brady" are exclusively concerned with the fortunes of his extraordinary woman, or his undying desire to behold her face to face. There is a lighter, brighter, livelier, more human side to this very various and exhilarating book. It is a sort of compendium of Dr. Russell's own principal experiences. And was there ever such a cosmopolitan pen? The early chapters of the first volume are deliciously Irish, and we have before us scenes and adventures which we know and feel to be thoroughly true. All the retainers about Bradystown are pourtrayed by the hand of one who is thoroughly at home among creatures whom most other writers evolve out of their own consciousness. There is a firm facility of touch in it all that shows the confidence of actual experience of the people and things brought before us, and the long practised hand of a master in reproducing them. Again, in the Crimea, the author treads upon ground that he knows by heart; and his description of incidents, all of which are no doubt drawn from memory, will to some readers be positively the most entertaining portion of his very entertaining volumes. On certain points he is as caustic as he was thirteen years ago; and every now and then it becomes transparent that he would like, if only for the fun of the thing, to fight an old quarrel or two over again. In India he is equally at his ease, and displays that power of investing every little episode with local reality which so long ago helped to win for him his wide-spread reputation. Let this then be said of his first—we sincerely trust not his last—novel, that it is intensely original, unflagging, various, never for one moment common place, and that it is written, from cover to cover, in a style which it is superfluous to praise. We only hope Dr. Russell has not put too much in it, but that there is plenty to follow. He has struck a new vein; we hope it will prove a rich one.

Ireland and the Estimates.

It has been alleged that Ireland is rather hardly treated in the arrangements for the expenditure of public money for purposes requiring it, but an examination of the Civil Service Estimates, now before the House of Commons, will show that no injustice is done to Ireland in this important department. The votes proposed for the promotion of education, science, and art in Ireland in the current year amount to £429,644, there being also a grant of £21,000 for the Queen's Colleges charged upon the Consolidated Fund, but the above sum does not include grants in aid to Irish schools of science and art, as these are not stated separately in the Estimates. The regium donum for Irish Nonconformists is £41,326; the £26,360 for Maynooth is upon the Consolidated Fund. Upon that fund also is charged the Lord-Lieutenant's £20,000, and these Estimates contain only votes of £6,176 for the household, and £22,927 for the Chief Secretary's office; this last item including, by a novel arrangement, the charges of inspection of prisons and lunatic asylums. Then there are votes of £979,239 for Irish constabulary and Dublin police; £117,369 for law courts, the judicial salaries being paid out of the Consolidated Fund; £185,618 for criminal prosecutions and prisons; £149,256 will be voted for public buildings in Ireland, £43,816 for public works of various kinds and public commissions, £21,722 for the register-office of births, &c., £95,267 for the administration of the Poor Law, £26,049 for hospitals and charities, £35,889 for superannuations, and £31,526 for a miscellaneous number of purposes, registration of deeds, public record-office, &c. A considerable proportion of the £9,000,000 to be voted this Session for civil services is for purposes in which all parts of the United Kingdom have a common interest; after allowing for these, more than £2,000,000 are, as above shown, to be expended in Ireland, more peculiarly for Irish advantage. But whatever does Ireland good does good to the United Kingdom.

* "The Adventures of Dr. Brady." By William Howard Russell. Three vols. Tinsley Brothers, 1868.

AN INCIDENT OF THE AMERICAN IMPEACHMENT.—In the course of the trial there have been many amusing episodes, but none more remarkable than the description by General Thomas of the famous attempt on the War Office, which was made on the 22nd of Feb. After obtaining admission he told the Secretary of War, whom he found sitting among some members of Congress, that he came to demand the office. Mr. Stanton refused to give it, and ordered him to his room as adjutant-general. He refused to obey, and was told that he could stand there as long as he pleased. But the sternness which the Minister affected towards the pretender in the presence of the members of Congress vanished when the two were alone together. "I left the room," says General Thomas, "and went to the office of General Schriver; Mr. Stanton followed me in there; he asked me pretty much the same question as before—whether I insisted on acting as Secretary of War, and whether I claimed the office. I gave the direct answer, and then there was some little chat between the Secretary of War and myself." A little pleasantry followed, about Thomas having had nothing to eat or drink, and then followed this most remarkable and engaging scene between the rivals:—"He put his arm around my neck as he used to do, in a familiar manner, and ran his hand through my hair, and I turned round to General Schriver, and said, 'Schriver, have you got a bottle here? Bring it out.' (Roars of laughter.) Schriver unlocked his desk and took out a small vial; the Secretary then proposed we should have a spoonful of whisky. I said I would take a little. General Schriver poured it out into a tumbler, and divided it equally. He took the glasses up in this way (indicating) and measured them with his eyes; presently a messenger came in with a full bottle of whisky, and he and I took a drink together."

PRINCE LOUIS OF HESSE.—Some sensation has been produced in Northern Germany by Prince Louis of Hesse's resignation of the command he held in the Hessian army. This event is said to have been caused by the intrigues of the anti-Prussian party at the Hessian Court. The Prince, whose liberal opinions have made him a great favourite with the Hessian people, has since the events of 1866 warmly advocated the entrance of the whole of the grand duchy into the North German Bund. The Grand Duke, on the other hand, still leans towards Austria, and, together with his minister, Herr von Dalwigk, does his utmost to resist the tendency of his people to unite with their fellow Germans. In this, however, he is opposed by the principal members of his family. Prince Charles, his brother, and the heir presumptive, is married to a Prussian Princess, and is a strong adherent of the Prussian alliance. This is even still more the case with his two sons, both of whom have passed the greater part of their military career in the Prussian army. Of these, Prince Henry is so strongly attached to Prussia that he remained in her service even during the campaign of 1866, though positively forbidden to do so by the Grand Duke. The other son, Prince Louis, (husband of our Princess Alice) is a Major-General in the Prussian army, and the command in the army of Hesse, which he has just resigned, was held by him in virtue of that rank.

Extracts.

The Ministry.
(From the "Times.")

The crowd of members who assembled in the House of Commons early yesterday afternoon testified by their presence their anxiety to learn what had been the decision of the Ministry. Would they resign, or could there by any possibility be a Dissolution? A glance at the faces of the listening members as Mr. Disraeli spoke showed how keenly they weighed every word which fell from his lips, and left no doubt as to the actual truth of the epithet "penal" which Mr. Gladstone subsequently declared was a constitutional and recognized description of an untimely Dissolution. Mr. Disraeli most cruelly, as the majority of his hearers thought, kept the House for a long time in suspense. He began by referring, with the studied impartiality of the Judicial Bench, to the excellent administrative qualities of his colleagues; he next proceeded to develope a view of the constitutional function of Dissolutions, more ingenious, perhaps, than accurate; and it was not until after a second digression on the moderation of Lord Derby in not advising a Dissolution when he entered upon office, or again last year, that he came to the points on which his audience were longing to hear him. It may, indeed, be doubted whether even then some of those present gathered more than a confused sense of consolation that there would be no Dissolution before the end of the autumn, if, indeed, before that month of January which has been so long fixed as the term of many a Parliamentary career.

Mr. Disraeli's description of his visit to Osborne was expressed in language so carefully chosen that it is dangerous to condense it. The advice which, as First Minister of the Crown, he tendered to Her Majesty was substantially such as we stated yesterday. He informed the Queen of the adverse votes of the House on Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions affecting the Irish Church. He placed before Her Majesty the state of parties and of the country, and it may be presumed that he anticipated the declaration he made last night in the House of Commons—that "it was the profound conviction of the Ministry that the opinion of the nation on the subject of the Irish Establishment did not agree with the vote of the House of Commons." Having made these communications, he submitted to Her Majesty the advice of her Ministers that she would be graciously pleased to dissolve Parliament, and take the opinion of the country on the conduct of the Ministry and the question of the Irish Church. So far there was nothing to which any just critic can object. It may be believed—we believe—that the country, instead of censuring, will warmly approve the action of the House of Commons in declaring that the Irish Church must be dis-established and disendowed. The country will simply echo back the voice of the House of Commons with fuller emphasis. But, when the First Minister of the Crown, speaking for himself and his colleagues, affirms their "profound conviction" to be to the contrary, their word must be taken. The Queen is constitutionally bound to act upon it. It is to no purpose to ask, with Mr. Gladstone, whether an appeal to the country after a majority so large as 65 has ever been known in our Parliamentary annals. The Crown cannot regard—

"Of nicely calculated loss or more."

But Mr. Disraeli's communication to Her Majesty did not stop with the advice to dissolve. He submitted that if the Queen thought the settlement of the question at issue or the interest of the country would be better served by the retirement of her Ministers they were prepared to resign. In fact, Mr. Disraeli tendered his resignation. It cannot be concealed that by this method of presenting the state of affairs to Her Majesty Mr. Disraeli shifted the responsibility of choice from the Minister to the Sovereign, and in form contravened a grave Constitutional principle. Mr. Ayrton in the subsequent discussion last night said as much, though he managed to detract from the merit of his discovery by his awkward comments upon it. To suggest that the House might be swayed by an apprehension that it was pursuing a course contrary to the views of Her Majesty herself was to detract from the freedom of discussion Mr. Ayrton meant to magnify. Her Majesty acted in the crisis as a Constitutional Sovereign. She commanded Mr. Disraeli's presence at a second audience, and then communicated her answer. By declining to accept the alternative resignation of the Ministry, and professing her readiness to dissolve Parliament as soon as the state of public business would permit the Queen threw back upon her Ministers the responsibility of the course they advised her to pursue. Upon this Mr. Disraeli resumed his proper position as the Constitutional adviser of the Crown. He represented to Her Majesty that the present constituencies were, at least, as well qualified as their representatives to express an opinion on the Irish Establishment, but her Ministers thought every effort should be made so that the appeal to the country should be directed to the new voters, and they believed, with the co-operation of Parliament, the appeal might be made in the Autumn. What the Ministry were prepared to do to effect this object Mr. Disraeli made plain in the remainder of his speech. They would engage in no protracted debates, and take no formal divisions on Mr. Gladstone's second and third Resolutions. He looked upon them as the corollaries of the first, and was ready to give Mr. Gladstone the earliest public day at his command to bring them on. He could not, indeed, with any self-respect, consent to the suspension of the Standing Orders for the purpose of putting them in the front of last night's business, although he intimated that had the request to take the Resolutions last night been made before he left the House on Friday morning, he should have assented to it.

The Duke of Somerset, in the House of Lords yesterday evening, succinctly, if plaintively, expressed the relation of the Hereditary Chamber to the Lower House by declaring that their Lordships were waiting to know what the House of Commons thought of the present state of affairs. It is, indeed, true that for some little time the House of Commons did not itself know what it thought of the matter. Mr. Gladstone withdrew his motion to suspend the Standing Orders; but Mr. Bouverie was faithful to his reputation as a zealous guardian of constitutional forms, and in the vehemence of his censure on the Ministry seemed to have forgotten how recently he denounced the Opposition as a "rabble." Brief are Parliamentary memories. Mr. Bright and Mr. Lowe supported each other in denouncing the affection of the Government for office; and Mr. Gladstone declined to bind himself in any solemn league and covenant with them. But the sense of the House favoured the arrangement proposed. The course to be pursued is without precedent, but the emergency, also, is without precedent, and in such a case that plan deserves adoption which shows the best possible way out of the difficulty. Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions will run their course, and if his Suspensory Act ever reaches the House of Lords its further progress will probably be stopped by the Veto of the "waiting" Chamber. In the meantime, there is no reason to apprehend that additional loss of a year which Mr. Bright dreads, inasmuch as Mr. Gladstone and his immediate associates can in the comparative freedom of Opposition prepare their final Bill, so as to have it ready when they succeed to office. The truth is, however, that a rejection of the Government scheme would effectually cause the loss of the year, a delay which would, according to Mr. Bright, make Irishmen doubt the sincerity of Liberal professions. The Dissolution hangs over the House of Commons. Mr. Disraeli, as the spokesman of the Ministry, has declared their solemn conviction that the country views the Resolutions of the House of Commons with disfavour, and Her Majesty has acceded to the recommendation that a Dissolution be granted. It follows that if the House refuses to proceed with the measures preliminary to the Dissolution in which an appeal can be made to the Reformed constituencies, an appeal will be made to the unreformed constituencies. This is the the choice before the House. The issue of an appeal to the unreformed constituencies would be the election of a Parliament whose first duty would be to eject the Ministry from office, the next to pass the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, the third to submit to another Dissolution, before the definite scheme for the dis-establishment and dis-endowment of the Irish Church could be approved by the representatives of the Reformed Constituencies of the United Kingdom. These considerations are sufficient to approve the wisdom of completing the work of Reform at once. There can be no doubt that it can be done so that an election might be held soon after Michaelmas. A special registration was an incident of the Reform Bill of 1832, and though Sir Robert Collier appeared to be anxious about the appeals from the Revising Barristers, few will share his anxiety. If the crisis be weighed, as it must be by the majority of the House, dispassionately, and apart from the mutual heat of competitors for office, the advantages of a rapid settlement of Reform, a speedy appeal to the reformed constituencies of the kingdom, and a speedy introduction into Parliament of a measure definitely and finally abolishing the Irish Establishment must outweigh the advantage of ejecting the Ministry after an immediate Dissolution, purchased as it must be by a real postponement of the great object desired.
